MORE COMMENTS. SMS Spam Here is where the spammers will send your messages and how you can deal with the delivery issues. NEW YORK CITY (Reuters) - The U.S. Federal Communications Commission on Wednesday proposed new rules that would allow telecommunication companies to charge more for messages that are blocked as spam. by FCC Chairman Tom Wheeler. "We will vote on these today," he told the commission. The measure, which will use a safety-and-advance standard for two-factor verification to identify who the sender of spam is, was adopted in 2005 but allowed to lapse in 2014. "The FCC action provides a powerful new tool to address the scourge of spam, and it will foster better data transparency that can then be used by researchers to improve spam analytics technologies," Wheeler said. The decision by the U.S. regulatory agency was prompted by a rise in spam beginning earlier this decade and has become a major focus for Internet users. The proposal in the FCC's rule-making proceeding would expand service providers' ability to charge a flat charge, in addition to per-message charges, when phone carriers blocked spam from being delivered. The FCC adopted the 569-page proposal in December to enact rules for a system of two-factor verification. Previously, the FCC did not have the authority to force the "responsible parties" of spam to verify their identity. The FCC is the U.S. agency that regulates telecommunications in the U.S. and oversees Internet service providers, local phone service and major cable television providers. The agency also has oversight over companies that provide Internet-based telephony services and companies that provide high-speed broadband Internet services. . The proposal would allow telephone service providers (TSPs) to block messages without disclosing the name of the sender to the sender. Under the proposal, email providers could block messages if they meet criteria outlined in two-factor verification, which is standard in email transmission. The electronic mail would be rejected if it does not include the sender's domain name or if it contains a pattern of spammy text. The FCC has stated that it will open the proposal to public comment in a 30-day period, after which the commission can adopt the measure. The Telephone Consumer Protection Act gives the FCC the right to award fines for violations of the TCPA. The authority to fine is a relatively new for the FCC and allows the agency to
